In exercise 1, practise both semitone and whole-tone trills, working up the scale until you have used all adjacent fingers. The speed of a falling finger is the same regardless of the tempo, so the faster the trill, the closer the fingers need to be to the string. Use a clean and even action, relaxing after each drop and lift, and be careful not to press down with the non-trilling finger.

The scale can be broken down into different components or “problems” such as one octave scales, shifting exercises, exercises for the coordination of left and right hands, finger preparation and finger placement. Rather than repeating a scale mindlessly over and over, search for exercises within the scale to address the particular problems you are having.

Bai, who studied violin and viola with Dorothy DeLay, William Lincer, Eudice Shapiro and Gorge Kast, has been inventing such exercises for his own practice on a daily basis for some 20 years, and at one point 15 years ago, he simply decided to write them down for a period of time. At the Primrose Festival he presented a handwritten packet of exercises, 35 pages. "This took 35 days to write; I ...

You can do scales, exercises and etudes and have enough time to work on your repertoire and orchestra scores. Serious teenagers who prepare for a professional career, but are still in school, can practice something like this. Lots of great concert violinists, like Janine Jansen don't practice more than 2 hours a day, but please note that they probably don't count concert and rehearsals as ...

Two daily bowing exercises. December 16, 2007 at 11:13 PM. Greetings, It was very interesting to hear maestro Ricci's reaction to the question `if you could pick one bowing exercise only, what would it be?' in Laurie's recent interview. There is, as he so cogently pointed out, no one answer to this issue. However, we do need a daily bowing routine (especially as an orchestral player ...

In contrast to pianists, the first scale for Suzuki violin students is A major, which - along with D and G major - is one of the natural keys of the violin. Unlike the white-note purity of C major on the piano, it may seem confusing to start with a scale that has three sharps. In my experience, young children take this in their stride, especially when you abandon finger names (A, A1, A21 ...
