By Glauber Rocha I. The Aesthetics of Hunger. Dispensing with the informative introduction that has become characteristic of discussions about Latin America, I prefer to examine the relation between our culture and civilized culture in broader terms than those which characterize the analysis of the European observer. Thus, while Latin America laments its general misery, the foreign observer ...

An Esthetic of Hunger - Glauber Rocha | Mediaseized

A tricontinental artist - he made films not just in Brazil but in Europe and Africa - Rocha was the victim of his own transience; he revelled in contradictions, in his aggressive theorising and self-attributed "aesthetic of hunger" - which took him from third-world-isation to the forefront of international filmmaking.

Rocha, Glauber [WorldCat Identities]

Rocha then proposes with fighting words a cinema that embraces rather than refutes or shrinks from hunger: "The Brazilian doesn't eat, but he's ashamed to say so. More importantly, he doesn't know where his hunger comes from. We know — we who made these ugly, sad films, these screaming, desperate films, in which reason hasn't always taken center stage — we know that hunger will not be cured by government plans and that the cloak of Technicolor will aggravate rather than hide ...
