There's also a misconception that because some research is pointing to biological abnormalities that psychopathy must be a strictly genetic or inborn condition (and disturbingly, some lawyers defending psychopaths have even offered the "bad brain excuse" as a way of exculpating their clients). But the fact is that we're just in the infancy stage of learning about the nature and origins of this condition. Biological influences indeed seem to play a role (most evidence coming from ...

Predators Among Us: The Psychopaths - Dr. George Simon

Yes and no. The genetic blueprint resulting in psychopathy is hereditary. The behaviors you associate with psychopathy are most often environmentally caused. So yes, but it means nothing. The genetics dont limit ones potential. If anything they open it up. So the biology is genetically hereditary, meaning can skip multiple generations. The behavior however is not hereditary nor guaranteed simply by biology.
