Norwegian Rose Painting

As with its Norwegian counterpart, it was most popular from the latter half of the 18th century and until the 1860s. History in America. Norwegian immigrants brought the art of Rosemåling to the United States since many of the immigrants came from parts of Norway where rosemåling was well established. They often carried their belongings in beautifully painted trunks. Some of the immigrants were Rosemåling painters. This generation, however, contributed little to the development ...

Rose painting is by no means a typical Norwegian art form. In most European countries, the rural communities would decorate objects and the inside of their homes with such decorative painting. The origins of the motifs often stem from the central cultural hubs of Europe, but the local variations flourished - and very much so throughout the often relatively isolated rural communities of Norway. As a result of a scattered population, and long distances between the communities, a wealth of ...

Norwegian Rose Painting. A living tradition from the 1820's to the current day. Nils Tveiterås came from Samnanger to Midthus in Hegglandsdalen i 1824. Like his father, he had practised the art of rose painting. As time went by Nils developed his own style which stood out from the traditional style he'd grown up with. This later became known as Os painting. Nils, who has now taken the ...

Traditional Norwegian art is created with wood carving, but these paintings move beyond the traditional to evoke the grandeur of Norway's natural setting, people and mood on canvas or paper. Settings like foyers, vestibules, and lobbies as well as grand hallways and formal dining areas are well-suited for these dignified depictions.
