Soviet Socialized Medicine

Designed primarily for laymen, this introduction to the Soviet health services serves as the to a comprehensive work intended for scholars in the field of medical organization and administration. The author is a sociologist who has impressive knowledge of the historical background of Soviet sociology, especially as it pertains to the Soviet health service. His dispassionate objectivity provides a refreshing contrast to the obvious overtones of some who discussed the system in relationship to ...

This poor medical care was reinforced by the fact that entrance into higher education in the Soviet Union was dictated by a system of affirmative action that had been introduced shortly after the triumph of the Socialist Revolution in 1917. At first belonging to a social class —worker, peasant, or intellectual—determined the entry quotas into colleges, universities, and technical schools. But the Soviet affirmative action system was soon expanded to include gender and ethnic ...

Socialized Health Care: The Communist Dream and the Soviet ...

The Soviet healthcare system was plagued by shortages of medical equipment, drugs, and diagnostic chemicals, and lacked many medications and medical technologies available in the Western world. Its facilities had low technical standards, and medical personnel underwent mediocre training. Soviet hospitals also offered poor hotel amenities such as food and linen. Special hospitals and clinics existed for the

Healthcare in Russia - Wikipedia

The primary unit of the Soviet Public Health Organization, the so-called polyclinic, in an average Soviet city is reserved for about 30,000 to 40,000 of the population. The area is divided into 10 to 15 districts, with 2,000 to 3,000 inhabitants living in each district. Such a district has its own physician and a nurse. Each patient seeking medical help and needing a certificate confirming his ...

From 1932 to 1947 he was director at Johns Hopkins University institute of history of medicine. He received financial aid from the Rockefeller Institute.

Henry E. Sigerist - Wikipedia

Most countries enslaved by the Soviet empire moved out of a fully socialized system through privatization and insuring competition in the healthcare system. Others, including many European social democracies, intend to privatize the healthcare system in the long run and decentralize medical control. The private ownership of hospitals and other units is seen as a critical determining factor of the new, more efficient, and humane system.
