Studies in ancient technology. (Book, 1955) [WorldCat.org]

Ancient civilizations in many parts of the world practiced irrigation. In fact, civilization would probably not be possible without some form of irrigation. The earliest form of irrigation probably involved people carrying buckets of water from wells or rivers to pour on their crops. As better techniques developed, societies in Egypt and China built irrigation canals, dams, dikes, and water ...

irrigation | National Geographic Society

In most areas of the world, the study of ancient irrigation practices is based entirely on archaeological remains, but it is difficult to reconstruct the linkages between these material remains and more ephemeral elements of society such as state administration and centralization because different social realities can lead to similar material manifestations. However, when the archaeological data is supplemented with other sources of information, such as texts and ethnography, it is possible ...
