In any debate, suppression of dissent is when a more powerful opponent tries to silence the other (directly and indirectly) rather than trying to defeat the arguments of the other advocate.

Suppression of dissent | Psychology Wiki | Fandom

Suppression of dissent occurs when an individual or group which is more powerful than another tries to directly or indirectly censor, persecute or otherwise oppress the other party, rather than engage with and constructively respond to or accommodate the other party's arguments or viewpoint. When dissent is perceived as a threat, action may be taken to prevent continuing dissent or penalise dissidents. Government or industry

The book is encyclopedic in its coverage, but Chester's detailed narrative of the government's prosecution of Eugene Debs for delivering a mild anti-war speech and Woodrow Wilson's vindictive insistence on imprisoning Debs and silencing dissent stands out as a chilling reminder of the fragility of freedom of speech when it really matters. His book is a reminder to progressives that preserving freedom of speech is crucial to achieving social change.

In extreme cases, contrarian scientists may face attempts at scientific suppression: discrediting or silencing a scientist or scientific claim in ways that violate accepted standards of scientific conduct. While such actions are unusual, they happen frequently enough to deserve careful consideration as breaches of academic integrity.
