Transportation and economic stagnation in Spain, 1750-1850 ...

The relationship between transportation and economic development is difficult to formally establish and has been debated for many years. In some circumstances, transport investments appear to be a catalyst for economic growth, while in others, economic growth puts pressures on existing transport infrastructures and incite additional investments. Transport markets and related transport infrastructure networks are key drivers in the promotion of more balanced and sustainable development ...

economic stagnation lies in the performance of men who have both an awareness of the problem of economic stagnation and the power to attack it but whose outlooks, objectives, and motivations lead them elsewhere. Whatever indictments can be made against Kuomintang economic performance during the Nanking period, it is neither fair nor accurate to maintain that this was a period of complete ...

The Kuomintang and Economic Stagnation, 1928-37

The state took control of certain key industries, including transportation, energy and communications, and set up a planning agency to regulate economic activity. The first national economic development plan, the Monnet Plan, and subsequent plans became a distinctive feature of France's post-war economic policy. In addition, De Gaulle began the construction of a welfare state in France and established key institutions such as social security and works councils that remain today.
