He has successfully analysed what sifts the competent colonels to make them starred generals. His selections of anecdotes are relevant and bring out qualities, which all of us who have worn uniform will realise are essential in producing the calibre of military leadership required at the highest ranks. The attributes which stand out, amongst others, are an elevated sense of duty, professionalism of a high order, moral character and humility. Armies everywhere will recognise these qualities ...

However, Newman gives us something more substantial in Chapter 54 "What are Generals Made Of?" Looking at the West Point cadets from his time there, he looks back upon those that eventually made the rank of General: Knowing which cadets would later become generals is not easy, but there were distinctions. They were well-liked cadets, respected, and got along with others. They all seemed to have an intangible aloofness about them, quiet self-control in manner and bearing.
